THE BAD BOY.

"Sée here, you coon, you get out of here," said the grocery man to the bad boy, as he came in the store with his face black and shining. "I don't want any colored boys around here. White boys break me up bad enough." .

"O, philopene," said the bad boy, as he put his hands on his knees and laughed so the candy jars ratiled on the shelves. "Fou didu't know me. I am the same boy that comes in here and talks your arm off," and the boy opened the cheese but and cut off a piece of heese so natural that the grocery nian had no difficulty in recognizing him;

ACT III. FBY GILBERT A BECKETT.

"Poor fellow! he seems ill this time and in a deal of trouble. What a pity it is he will write so grand and not keep to nature."

Mrs. Clive, number three, passed letter acress the breakfast-table and tock some clotted cream. Her husband clawed up his brother's handwriting with a glare.

"Keep to nature! Stick to business, you mean. Confound the fellow! Ho never makes a half-penny by his wretched scribbling, or keeps it if he author. And so, at length, worry, disdoes. Only a few years ago they came bothering me for five pounds to bury upon him the last dark hour of his life. the boy, and now the daughter writes for five more—I suppose to bury him. I'm sick of it; they must manage with wo." Mr. Bartholomew Clive, of the firm of Harbinger, Harbinger & Clive, wrote the check and sent it, payable to order, failing voice: and carefully crossed, to his elder brother. He had managed, by judicious conduct in the course of a family quar rel, many years ago; to oust the latter from his birthright; but it is only fair to him to say that he had hated him hon ally and cordially ever since. Having, moveover, in the course of his matrimonial experiences, led to the altar the heiress to a great tallow interest, subscribed regularly to several missionary societies, locked up a rich relative in a madhouse, corned a reputation for assisting real, but solvent, suffering, wherever-met with, at the moderat rate of 60 per cent, and married three wives, all three for their money, it is superfluous to add that he was widely nown na ritogether a "safe man.

Of a different mold was his elder brother, Anthony. He did not believe in tallow; but he twice in his life begit, call an artistic nature. He went like a child when his father, who had brother, who had robbed him. He had, too, vague theories that life was meant for something nobler than the got out of it. Moreover, he wrote. In a word, he was altegether an unsafe up and down it, out at elbows, knew nothing but drew the hand of the low-round the door into the chamber of flours in the low ing little speaker to his lips. But there was a Grub street in these figure in their literary world—it was so stopendons. Yet they had done what they could for him-they had made him one of them. They had done this by giving him a long clay pipe, a pot of porter and showing him the way to Parasses; that classic mount was ascended thus in those days.

So Anthony looked upward, with long clay pipe and a pot of porter, and found himself at the rine age of five and-twenty, "somebody." As "some body," he was familiarly slapped on the back in a club with a guinea on trance fee, and hailed by some of the first intellects of the time, and by a good many of the seconds, as "Tony." Before him, the efore, was a future of no common order. Many contributors of verses to provincial papers would have given their eyes for such an open Tony recognized this sterling fact, and was grateful. Here he was instructi g a cert in-sometimes an un certain-portion of the British public at the rate of seven shillings and six pence a column. Having, notwithstanding his method of ascending Par nassus, considerable depth and culture and withal a quiet sense of a humor, i struck him that, undeniably glorious as was this work, it was not exactly of the kind which he had purposed to himself a short time since, when taking his degree at Cambridge. He had looked to a more exalted platform. A perpetual lounge in the company of Steele, Add son, Goldsmith, Thackeray and Macanlay was what that megic phrase. "a literary career," had conjured up for him. Literature was not only to supply him with a comfortable competenes—this byi usly as a matter of course-but was to sweeten, a lorn and know it. Yet you rail at me like a clevate his life. . Confident of its nower to do this, he married a gentlegicl who, with even purer and nobler aspirations hoped with all his hopes, and say with fortable on the ide..) platform prepared necessary, evon somewhere at the back, for Shakspeare himself.

So, if love and sympathy could have given aubstance to his vision, Tony had lived right royally to the end. Unhaupily, love and sympathy, useful things in their way, were powerless for this. They helped him, it is true, when he had to bury his boy for £5. But matters did not better with the floating years; and so it came to mass that when niter twenty of them had shuddered away his gentle wife having long since passed, with all her hopes, to the practical quiet of a suburban cemetery—he found himself in the back street of a provincial town, dying in the dingy poverty of a second floor, he realized that, for good or ill, he had either not had, or, if it had come to him unawares, he had somehow missed his chance. Tom. Berrymore, who never walked out without an original five-act comedy of this own in his cost pocket. set it down to the iniquity of what every gonius who has never belonged to it knows as the "Dramatic Ring."

The public did not know, but Ton did, that the select few whose names were figuring everlastingly on every play-bill were in league with metropol itan management generally, for the sole purpose of "strangling out" rising genius. Their signs and passwords were known. There was no sceret about it. They met once a week in a coal-cellar in the Adelphi, and, burning an official MS., bought by the pound from a starving outsider, drank to the "damnation" of all maiden offerts in boiling gin.

The "Ring" was, therefore, a power-ful and admirably conceived institution. However, whether or not the "Ring" had anything to do with it, Tony did not make his mark as a dramatic appointment, work and want brought Here he was dying, poor fellow. And as with his wasted hand he stroked the fair hair of the pretty child, as slender girl of sixteen, who sat by his bedside, a mist came before his eyes, and he cried, passionately, but in a thin, feeble and

"Without me! Merciful heaven! what will she do without me?"

His little daughter kissed his whit forehead, gave him some toast-andwater, and with a bright, hopeful smile whispered a great deal of loving chatter in his ear. It ought to have rallied the forces of a man dying in poverty and want, of a broken heart, for its substance was as follows:

"Everything was taking a turn for the botter. Uncle Bartholomew had sent a check for two pounds, which would pay a third of the rent. That was some thing, wasn't it? But what was that to the letter from Mr. Tarragen, the manager of the Theater Royal? That was quite glorious; could be read again and again. Could words say more than this?"

What a humbug you are!" Mr. Bartholomew Clive got up quite nnoyed,

"I might have saved myself this journey," he said, glancing savagely round the room; "it's clear I've had it for nothing." The dying man looked at his portly visitor steadily. A faint fire kindled in hią cye. "I did not ask you to take it," he said, mecauring out his words slowly, with the emphasis of restrained but rising passion; "I haven't sont for you; and as I am dying, in the name of God, if you have anything human about you, go, and let me die in peace." He drew his child close to him. -The other glared at him in carnest now. "Oh! this is your gratitude, is it?" he growled with set teeth. "Well, it's just like you. You've always been the same; never been grateful for any thing anybody has ever done for you. Here I've come down from town merely to see what I could do for your girl if anything happened, and you abuse me as if I hadn't helped you out of half-adozen mosses-yes, over and over again And you back her up against me, do you? Why, you fool, but for me she'd have to go to the work-house, and you madman. You'd better look out, and not drive me too far!" Mr. Bartholomew Clive had not much that was human about him, but it struck all his eyes. I Indeed, with them she him this was a next speech, and he gave naw yet more than he; for she would it with point. The child made a more never for a moment have consented to ment toward him. She tried to speak, his making himself thoroughly com- but her quivering voice broke in tears. Sho could only clasp her father tightly for him, until room had been found, if in her arms. He was sitting up croet in bed now-a wild, fatal flush in his cheek. His portly younger brother had, with an instinct of solf-preservation, drawn near to the door that led to the sitting room beyond, for he did not like being cursed by anybody, even on a death Bed; but in a war of words, with sufe retreat before him, it greatly southed him to have the last." And so hertook the handle and held the door njar, not noticing that, as he did so. two figures entered the sitting-room softly from the other modest entrance that opened on the grimy flight of stairs nutside

Both the new-comers were cleanshaven, smelled of tobacco tempered with gas, and had braid upon their conts. One possessed quite a brandnew hat. This was Mr. Sidney Tarragon, the manager of the Theater Royal. The other was distinguished by a rich brown wig, an almost too-excollens set of teeth, and a plated pair of eye-glasses. At night, carefully made up and with the first pick of the wardrobe, he did not look more than about 47 as Romeo. It had been said that he had played Lear five years ago in his own bair. He was an eminentlyuseful member of the profession. This was Mr. Sidney Tarragon's leading

"Leave me, you coward!" it cried. Leave me? Isn't it enough to have darkened the light of my whole life, that here, across my death-bed, you must come and cast your hideous shadow? Hal you wince because I who have forgiven you—yes, seventy times soven—and, hoping that a change might come on you, have held my peace through the long, long years of your heartless, your brutal indifferenceturn on you when the eleventh hour has struck, and tell you I call God to witness that spite of myself, the very name bear, the very blood that flows within my veins are utterly hateful to me because of the mysterious curse which has made them common to us both. Does this sound so horrible to you? Look back to the day when, with smooth words, proffering your aid as a brother, you robbed me like a thief! Look back, I say, to that day, and tell me with the last words that I shall ever hear from your lips, tell me, if you can-tell me if you dare, that for the wrong you did me then, you have not borno me a malignant and undying hatred over since! You answer nothing; but whiten as I speak; whiten." The voice of the speaker was choked; he fell back, feeling for something with his thin hands, as one in darkness. On one of the great railroads of our country the morning express always stops near a large grain elevator. About the place time pigeons collect in search of the scattered seeds. For a long time it was noticed that these birds were in the habit of flying along beside the train for a while as it started. An intelligent gentleman, who had occasion to ride on the train frequently, set himself to study out the reason for their strange course. His conclusion was that the birds were racing with the express. When the train started, scores of them would rise and fly along. beside it. As it moved inster, one after another gave up the race and turned back, till, when the train had reached its maximum of speed, there agre only about five or six who kept and these invariably turned luck when they reached a certain little stream. Now, had they been frightened by the train, surely they would have flow away from it, and not along beside it. It seems quite clear that the birds deliberately planned the race every morning; that the less-rapid fliers among them dropped out as the train moved faster and faster; that the little stream was the goal at which it was agreed that all should turn back. It would seem difficult to explain their movements without granting that they oceaces power to reason and that, in this case at least, they made use of that power. - Rev. J. A. Cass, in Good
